Text

My very good Lord having already finished my former packett of lettres ready to send them away and the bearer being by meanes of contrary windes afterwarde here staid, I received your Lordships lettres of the xxvth of September, wherevnto by reason of the oldnes of 5 their date, I thought best presently to answer least my lettres longer differred should with them wexe likewise olde. And first concerning the answering of such dislykes, as are there conceived of the Charges of this Realme, hoping that in the generall answer to the Memorialles full satisfaccion is already yielded I shall the lesse need further to trouble your Lordship. lykewise touching the Defalcations made out of your former threasure before th'arrivall thereof here (wherein your Lordships lettre hath labored at large) I will leave the same vnto your further reckoning of the Treasurer here, to whose care th'accoumpt there of perteyneth. And for the rest, lyke as your Lordship hath given me your certein promise that out of such threasure, as shall from tyme to tyme bee sent ouer hether, you will not suffer any defalcations vpon billes there

□Note on handsThe address and text of this letter are in Spenser's usual secretary hand, here fairly bold. The first line of the subscription is also in Spenser's hand, but the second line has been added by Grey, who has also provided his usual autograph signature. The endorsement is in a distinct, later hand, probably added during the filing of Burghley's papers. The note appended to the bottom of the first page of the letter, in what is probably Spenser's mixed hand, seems to have been added to remind Spenser, or another secretary, that, upon sealing of the letter, the packet should be directed to Burghley.
