cownsell of Ireland
vnto her Maiestie

Text

It maie please your maiestie From the begyning of this pale rebellion hauing hadd depe causes of surmise that the same was procured or at the leaste faouored of great parsonages either for gredines of paie or arrogante zeale to poapishe governemente, stirred vs to vse all endeour for the trieng out therof, whearby coming to apparant matter that chardged the lorde of Kildare and Barron of Delvyn, we thoughte it our dueties to call them to the aunswearing of it: An assemblie therfore of the nobillitie besides Councell was warned, in showe but for aduice and aide of the Countrie in the planting of garrisones nowe this winter aboute the rebells: The same accordinglie come together, and that matter in dede onelie begon to be delte in, the Lord of Delvyn we knowe not howe, breaking oute, founde him self greved, that he with other of the nobilitie was suspected, and further that he was aduertised from Englande it was informed youre Highenes that he was become a rebell He desired if any man coulde charge him, he mighte aunswear and clere him self or ells reste condemned. This challenge by* the Barron of Delvin made to clere him self before he was charged, offred us occasion without further circumstaunce to examyne him howe often, with the viscounte Baltinglas sithen Easter laste, and before the time of his rebellion, his aunswere he laide downe, in writing and subscribed, we seperated him and vppon deliuerie to the whole Councell of what hadd bene founde by examinacion falsifieng his declaracion, all the boord vniuersallie (the Earle of Kildare being one) ordred his comitment to the Castell to be further delte with: he thus comitted, we charged the Earle with suche apparant matter, as proued he certainelie knewe the vicecount woulde breake out, and hadd assured intelligence of diuers his principall Councillors and partakers, and that notwithstandi[ng] hauing the vicounte after in his companye, hee rather guarded him from apprehension, then assented or liked to haue apprehendid him (his aunswere denyeng) apparaunt matters vttred by him to the Lord Archebusshopp of Dublin and from the Lord Archebisshopp to him, occasionned us all vehementlie to suspecte him as a principall comforter of the vicecounte to enter into this action, and so with an entier voice of all, he was likewies comitted: In warde they boathe nowe remayne in the Castell of Dublyn: The matters which accuse them, we haue set downe in as brief notes as we coulde comprehend them, and the same herewith sent to your maiestie: We haue seized to your maiesties vse, all the landes and goodes of the saide Earle and Barron: We haue his two sonnes, and the same comitted to the custodie of me the Chauncellor, to be by me saulfelie kepte vntill we shall vnderstand your maiesties pleasure howe to bestowe them. Ther be many materiall circumstaunces more then are nowe sent, And because your maiestie might be the better satisfied of euerie scruple that might arise concerning the Earle or the Barron, we thoughte good that one of our selves might be employed in this messaige, and therefore haue concludid vppon one of your maiesties Secretories here mr Fenton to be the bearer, to whom we haue deliuered full instructions to aunswere any doubte that mighte be obiected, humblie craving your maiesties fauor and credit to be given vnto him, which his care and diligence in your maiesties seruices here well deserue the
